At its core, “Time Devours All Things” is about acceptance of self and embracing what we have no control over. There is beauty in change, and our endurance through it only makes us stronger. If all good things come to an end, all bad things must also.

Safari Room’s third album, “Time Devours All Things,” is a thematic and musical response to the band’s second album, ‘Complex House Plants.’ This third album deals with the dissolving of relationships, paths in life and time, necessitating a firm foundation of self and an acknowledgment of what is within our control. Musically, the indie rock outfit’s third album expands on every sound put forth before this record. Lyrics are deeper and more personal, sonics and riffs are heightened, and the arrangements and orchestrations shine even brighter. It is a maturation of a sound and a fully-realized indie rock album.

Safari Room is the indie rock outfit and brainchild of Alec Koukol (Omaha-native, now Nashville-local).

“We’re not that different you and me,” Alec Koukol repeats throughout the swelling bridge of “Garden Talker,” and that line might as well be a mission statement for Safari Room. Koukol describes “human connection as a founding cornerstone” as the project’s ethos, and that message is a through-line for Safari Room’s entire discography so far. The band is known, particularly in Nashville, for their special brand of indie rock, their live shows and the sense of community that comes from singing Safari Room’s songs together. That’s Safari Room’s hope, and that’s what they’re going for with their upcoming third album, ‘Time Devours All Things’. Slated for a release on February 23rd, 2024, this album is the band’s biggest, boldest, and most personal yet; in other words, they’re Safari Room at their very best.
